It seems that a Photoshop window is a world unto itself, with development going on far away from your work, and a hierarchy sets in that needs to be respected. Even in the "advanced mode," Photoshop is slow to open files. As you try to open an initially empty DNG photo from a 35mm film, the file size can take several seconds to appear in the window. You also run into problems with performance when working with large HD images. There isn't as much room for maneuvering, and when you are trying to perform operations on very large files, it can take a bit more effort than it does with Lightroom. Lightroom's speed and efficiency in managing every type of file is second to none. The only complaint I have about Lightroom's file management is that there isn't a simple way to export a folder. However, its fast-executable and quick-to-open features are still its best asset. Geo-tagging and location lat/long coordinates are native features in Photoshop. That is, when you draw a line or path or annotate something, you can also choose and type a location in relation to your drawing. Either Geo-tagging or location keywords can be chosen when working, and saved and reused. You can use a feature like this for identifying your work, in your portfolio, or to help someone else out who has some knowledge of your work. Photoshop's new Cloud Save feature lets you save any file you open to your creative cloud to access it from anywhere. It's easy to get started with this feature, and you can receive notifications when files are saved to your Creative Cloud. You can choose to leave files open and stored in the cloud, or save files to your local drive, and you can choose to automatically sync your computer's files to the cloud.

While the new web-based features are great for access to older content and less-expensive upgrades for existing users, all new users can now open and save the web formats directly in Photoshop without any plugins or other software. Adobe has also stated that they plan to bring official apps to iOS and macOS as well, and so, support for desktop-based features will be limited to any new features and updates as long as new browser based APIs exist. However, they would still support the web-based formats as a fallback when their users can't use their apps because of security-related features, privacy concerns, or for whatever other reason. Adobe has been busy over recent years creating a new modern interface, selecting the Edge experience for Windows 10. The persona-based user interface results in a more familiar feel, with full-screen modes to view changes to documents in monitor space, a new multi-tool bar that provides quick access to buttons, and a new preview window and interface that builds on the existing interface. The newly released Adobe Photoshop updates are being introduced to the public via an update release to the desktop software version. The cloud versions of Photoshop Elements and Photoshop CC will begin rolling out to users later this month. Filling the gap between desktop and mobile editing, the Photoshop desktop app features a new browser-enabled experience. The browser-enabled features help users easily design, work, and iterate on projects with a team in other spaces. For example, the new Split View, Share for Review and ability to comment on one another's projects increases collaboration and efficiency after a phone call or FaceTime chat. To speed up the creative workflow, Adobe is introducing new workflow enhancements, including a streamlined addition of adjustments and previews for editing in the browser. It includes Auto-Tone, Fill and Reduce Projection, plus a new adjustment manager for easier, more efficient adjustments. With the new browser (Today), changes made in Photoshop directly reflect on the device, so users can preview these edits in real time, save time and resume the edits and dialogs in Photoshop. "By working seamlessly across desktop and mobile, people are able to edit, collaborate and design with greater efficiency by staying focused on the creative process where it really matters," said Paul Silla, vice president of Creative Cloud. "With the browser unveiled at MAX, customers will now be able to collaborate with a team on a project from any other device in real time - helping them to work smarter and faster, wherever they are."

Adobe used the new year to announce that Photoshop will soon be the only way to edit large images and videos. After minor launch tweaks to the interface, the next version of Photoshop will be called Photoshop Next, and it will replace the current Adobe Photoshop CC. Photoshop Next is said to focus on managing large files and websites. The current version of Photoshop CC estimates that workload at 50 million to 60 million pixels, while Photoshop Next estimates that workload at up to 144 million pixels.
