Bob's photography work is a positive example of a company's supplementary efforts to have a wide colour palette available for photo editing. Originally from a previous job as a graphic designer, Bob's in-house photography workflow went through three stages before being put into practice. Nowadays you can expect to often see him wearing shades of black, white, and grey in his photography. We're seeing a wider use of colour in it's most raw, natural form. I spent a few days at the Canon booth at the CEDIA Expo 2018 in Denver to see what the company has in the pipeline. Here is what my notes on the subject. These are the Prime, Cinema EOS Cinema EOS C100, Cinema EOS C300 Mark II, Cinema EOS C500, and Canon C700. The Cinema EOS C300 Mark II and Cinema EOS C500 are using the new EF Cinema cameras that Canon is releasing. They are listed on the C500 as C500 or EF for short. The C100 is also a replacement for the C100 mark IV. While only a few inches larger, the ILC-SR sensor is larger as well. The C300 Mark II and C500 have live view instead of a viewfinder, both smart for a raw shooter (or number cruncher). If you're looking to get into the film analog game, then check out these C100 , C300 Mark II & C500 will make you drowsy. ABOVE: Why not have a seven layer dip? BELOW: The Canon C100 is a fixed-lens camera with a variety of creative options available at launch via Live View. The C100 can capture RAW and JPEG files simultaneously and features 39 MP photos.
