In a few days time, two new releases of the popular Adobe Photoshop software will be published by Adobe. The first one is the update to general release, the second one is a basic update . The new Photoshop Creative cloud version and the Windows version of the software will be published at the same time. An update that's supposed to hit Android on May 15 is the Photoshop CC 2013 program. It looks like the desktop app was meant to make Android, iOS and Adobe XD apps, but whatever reason, the desktop version already supports Android. The apps will include Photo Merge, Document and Layer Merge, Spot Healing Brush, Content Aware Fill, and Liquify, among others. This version also features new Photo Filter effects, a 3D Photo Filter and new Lens Correction effects as well as Motion Blur, HDR Tone Mapping and Levels, Noise, etc. One thing that I haven't used previously myself and could hardly imagine using is always-on RAW conversion, in particular on the iPad Pro. However, the way Lightroom lets you do that lets me really appreciate its functionality. If you aren't familiar with the process, it starts with you shooting a picture on the iPad Pro. You then point it at the picture in the XMP-compliant Adobe Camera Raw library, and when you edit that image in Lightroom, the metadata, including that information, is exported as an XMP file to the photo. When you save the image, it's automatically processed and converted to the image format of your choice (most of the time this is JPEG). Some of you may be familiar with the RAW-to-JPG feature that was already included with previous versions of Astrophotography. In that mode, Lightroom can automatically process RAW files for you.
